The latest games are due to an agreement with MNF to hold up a bit with. ESPN gets a less spectacular schedule than NBC's Sunday Night Football. ESPN never gets a Super Bowl and just started carrying ESPN lacks nbc's flexible rights, which can swap a sub-optimal game for one that promising on CBS or Fox, as it was on Sunday. Instead of carrying its scheduled Jets-New England game, NBC took Denver-Kansas City from CBS. For this smaller deal, ESPN pays N.F.L. $1.9 billion a year, nearly double what any of its network rivals are. Yes, the contract includes extremely valuable video and emphasizes rights that support numerous programs and network platforms as well as project and other goodies. But it hardly seems like a deal. Our deal is much bigger than Monday Night Football, said Burke Magnus, executive vice president of ESPN. For us, it's a round group proposal. Comparing the investments of ESPN and other N.F.L. networks, he said it's apples and oranges in n.e. He added: I understand the comparison, but we don't suffer because of it. ESPN's profitability has long allowed it to pay $1.9 billion a year. The league realized ESPN's ability to pay a decade ago when ESPN succeeded ABC as home to Monday Night Football and NBC took over Sunday night from ESPN. The N.F.L. shrewdly, even cravenly, acknowledged that even when it sold NBC's prime-time package, it could still soak up ESPN. More than any other network, ESPN needs N.F.L. games to help maintain its monthly subscription fees, the backbone of its financial structure. So, in a contract that began in 2006, ESPN agreed to pay $1.1 billion a year, nearly doubling NBC's $600 million. When it came time to renew the deal through 2021, the price rose to $1.9 billion a year. NBC pays $950 million. No one outlined the ESPN-N.F.L. relationship better than the Denver Broncos owner, Pat Bowlen, who was chairman of the league's broadcasting committee when the deal was signed. He was blunt about why ESPN pays much more than other networks, and he didn't dwell on the double stream of subscribers and advertising revenue that others lack. We felt we deserved a lot of that money because the N.F.L. is a big part of their programming, he said. They wouldn't be anything near that they are without us. Ten years later, Monday Night Football isn't the powerhouse it once was - and you can't blame it on announcer John Gruden confusing viewers with his game call arcana. Audiences fell 17 percent to 10.7 million, and the decline at ESPN continues in the two games since Donald Trump was elected president. By contrast, NBC's audience increased in each of the two weeks after the election, reducing the season's decline to 14 percent. But on Sunday, the audience of 18.4 million for Kansas City's 30-27 overtime win over Denver fell 27 percent from last year's week-to-12 game. Perhaps it would be premature to think that Election Day would magically lift the cloud over N.F.L. ratings when so many other factors were also in play, such as the lack of a superteam, the national anthem protests, concerns about concussions and domestic violence and new England's early-season suspension Tom Brady. In addition, the legal problems of daily fantasy companies FanDuel and DraftKings prevented these companies from focusing their clients' attention on this season. Losing millions of subscribers over the years to cord cutters and internet services could also hurt ESPN. Saturation is another possible problem: Three windows of Sunday games, Monday and Thursday night games and a few early Sunday games from Europe may be more football than most people need. Pro Football Talk reported recently that the league is considering a reduction or elimination of Thursday's game. Players and coaches have long disliked the short time of preparation for these games, but the league enjoys the $450 million CBS and NBC pay for them this season and next. A league spokesman denied the report. There certainly won't be cuts to Monday night's games. So ESPN must endure a schedule that this season, for example, has only one appearance each for Green Bay, Denver and Dallas, while NBC has three for the Packers and Cowboys and four for the Broncos. NBC has another advantage: While teams can play prime time five times a season (four in total on NBC and ESPN and one on Thursday night), three can play for the sixth time - but all must be shown by NBC. NBC's advantages have been there since the deals were made, Magnus said. They were constant from the start. Perhaps Monday night's Green Bay-Philadelphia game will bring positive news to ESPN. The Packers tend to have a good national draw, but it was ESPN's misfortune to carry the Packers game when they were 4-6, facing a 5-5 Eagles team. If you had told me at the beginning of the year that Green Bay would be 4-6 when we carry them, I would still say: I'll take another Packers game, Magnus said. That belief in the Packers was rewarded: The game's audience of 13.1 million was 29 percent more than the network got for Baltimore's 34-27 victory over Cleveland a year earlier.
